

April 5, 2006

No Bank of Wal-Mart! The Wal-Mart stores already undermine local economies. They secure incentives paid for by the cities they come to without putting that money back into the economy. This company pays their workers low wages. It fails to provide benefits to a majority of their workers, who then turn to local and state programs for medical and food stamp assistance out of necessity. Many times the local Wal-Mart has meant the death of choice in available retailers. I don't shop at Wal-Mart mainly because their goods are cheap junk although there are also moral reasons why I will not shop there. I don't desire to see another version of cheap junk in the form of a Wal-Mart 'bank' whose presence would most likely stifle competition in our local economies. The Wal-Mart family has enough money.

Delicia McFarland